DEFINTIONS

Primary Jobs – Primary jobs are defined in economic development as those that bring in new revenue to the community. Many of those jobs produce a product (like manufacturing), however other service sector jobs also circulate dollars from outside the city and create additional jobs. These jobs tend to be high-wage paying and require higher levels of education or skilled trades.

Secondary Jobs – Secondary jobs are defined in economic development as those that circulate money already in the city, such as retail and food service. They have little spinoff or additional job creation associated with them.
